libraries.

Stanford Copyright Renewal Database: <https://exhibits.stanford.edu/copyrightrenewals>

- Books first published or registered in the U.S. before January 1, 1923 are in the public domain because of copyright expiration and books published after January 1, 1964 had their copyrights automatically renewed by statute. For the period of 1923 through 1963, copyrights were renewable, and if they were renewed, they may still be valid and enforceable today. Stanford has a searchable and downloadable database of copyright renewals during this timeframe (not initial registrations) for books published in the US. Researchers can use the renewal date to determine the end of copyright protection.

Deflection

Deflection is a means of automatically skipping lenders. Deflections are based on specific criteria (age, value, format, etc.). Deflected requests do not display to the deflecting library, thereby decreasing both staff time spent reviewing requests that would be declined and decreasing patron wait times because the request automatically moves to the next lender in the string.

Direct Requests/Unmediated Borrowing/Patron Initiated Borrowing

These are different terms for sending borrowing requests directly from the patron to the lender for fulfillment without staff intervention on the borrowing side, resulting in faster service for patrons. Some systems, like Relais, offer completely unmediated borrowing.
